New research by Eagle Hill Consulting reveals that the majority of Boston employees believe that integrity is on the decline in corporate America. And according to them, the decline starts at the top – with their C-suite executive leadership.

Boston workers report widespread decline of integrity. Over half say that integrity has gotten worse in companies, and nearly three-quarters believe integrity is falling across the nation.

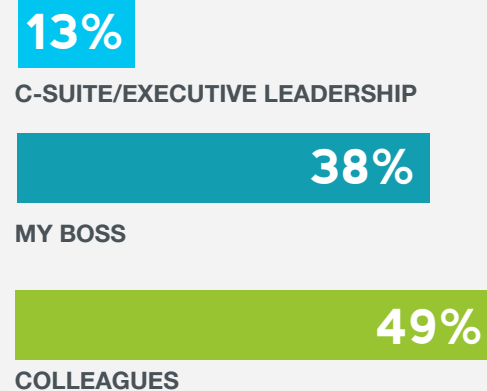

According to those surveyed, the decline starts at the top. Only 13 percent say that corporate executives have the most integrity in the workplace (compared to immediate bosses and colleagues).

“Only 13 percent say that corporate executives have the most integrity in the workplace.”

“ 44% of workers have witnessed unethical behavior at work, yet only 21% have reported it. ”

Nearly half of Boston workers report witnessing unethical behavior at work, but few report it.

Workers say that some of the reasons they wouldn't report unethical behavior include fearing how it might impact them and not knowing what to do.

METHODOLOGY

The survey included 563 interviews across the Boston metro-area adult working population. The survey polled respondents on issues of culture, specifically integrity, respect, trust and unethical behavior in the workplace. The results were weighted to reflect US demographic factors, including age, income, and gender. The 2018 Eagle Hill Consulting Boston Culture Survey was conducted by Ipsos in April 2018.
