

Work won't be the same after pandemic shutdowns.

HOW CAN BOSTON EMPLOYERS BE READY?

Concerns among Boston employees about returning to the workplace are higher than worries at the national level, according to a new poll by Eagle Hill Consulting.

AS WORKPLACES OPEN BACK UP AFTER THE COVID-19 SHUTDOWN, WHAT ARE YOU MOST WORRIED ABOUT?

67 percent of Boston employees say that they are worried about exposure to COVID-19 at their job. Nationally, this number is at 54 percent.

BEING EXPOSED TO COVID-19 AT WORK

More than one-third of Boston workers are concerned that COVID-19 will change the way they work. That's nearly 1.5 times higher when compared to workers across the nation.

THE WAY I WORK WILL CHANGE

SOME GOOD NEWS

The vast majority of Boston employees (73 percent) have confidence that their employers will be prepared to safely bring them back to the workplace.

But, that puts a big burden on employers to deliver.

COVID-19 is perhaps the most significant business disrupter in modern history, and it is fundamentally changing the way we work. It's paramount that Boston-area employers are anticipating the impacts of the new ways of working while ensuring employees are trained and equipped to thrive in the new environment.

JONATHAN GOVE, EAGLE HILL CONSULTING'S BOSTON LEAD

Employees indicate that several factors would make them feel safe returning to the workplace, including physical distancing, testing, protective gear and careful monitoring of the workforce. Delivering on these expectations may be challenging and expensive for businesses.

WHAT CAN YOUR ORGANIZATION DO TO MAKE YOU FEEL SAFE GOING BACK TO THE OFFICE?

Now is the time for organizations to revisit their operating model, employee and customer experience, along with training and skill development requirements to support new ways of doing business.

Learn more COVID-19: BOUNCE FORWARD